Chapter 1 by Fanwizard

The day things were thrown out of order, I didn't know it would happen. It was a Thursday, the most promising day of the week, in my opinion, since it's the day when anything can happen. Nothing happens on Thursday, which basically makes it a second Friday.

Aunt Jennifer made sure I got out of bed, dressed, ate breakfast, brushed my teeth and hair, and made it on the bus without having to run as usual.

I sat alone on the crowded and noisy bus, my backpack beside me, my nose stuck in a book, my head swaying to the movement of the bus, as usual.

I got off the bus first, as soon as the bus shuddered to a stop and the doors swung open, my book under my arm, as usual.

I went to my locker to drop my jacket, lunch bag, and extra books off, organizing the contents inside carefully before leaving, as usual.

It was basically your average day, if you were me. Making it to class without being tardy, eating lunch alone, my nose stuck in a book, then making it home safely, where Aunt Jennifer was waiting for me with a snack already prepared and the table cleared, ready for me to start my homework.

I had finished my algebra homework and was placing it back into my backpack, ready to start my History project, when there was a knock at the door.

"I'll get it," Aunt Jennifer said. "You can start your homework?"

I nodded. Aunt Jennifer always said I was a good student, which apparently was inherited from my paternal side. I was the only child of my mother, who died when my dad was in high school, due to lung cancer, even though she never smoked.

Aunt Jennifer opened the door, then gaped at the visitor, her eyes bugging out of their sockets. Her jaw was just hanging out, as she put it, able for flies to fly in.
